Fragility is a creative partnership between James Grice and Andrew Silverwood, who met whilst training together at Rose Bruford College of Theatre and Performance in 2009. They merge physical theatre, contemporary theatre and stand up comedy to create a unique way of storytelling.

In the two years since they graduated, the pair have created five new works and sold out shows to audiences in The Czech Republic and Sweden.

BirthDay Suit Party is a double bill of two of their shows, the critically acclaimed My First Ten Sexual Failures and Other Stories About Growing Up and a new work GameShow, which has just returned from winning the Expect the Unexpected Award for daring theatre at Stockholm Fringe Festival.

My First Ten Sexual Failures is an autobiographical story of sex, relationships and all the other things people have when they grow up. It is about the silly things that boys and girls do to each other.

GameShow is a new show. It features the UK debut of Australian performer Kristian Pirotta and tests just how far he, as a performer, is prepared to go to win every night on stage in a totally improvised gameshow. Past shows have seen paintball guns, whole audience pie fights, French kissing, mouse traps and birthday cake. Not even we know what the next shows will bring.

Both performances feature Andrew Silverwood, a 24 year old actor, originally from Portsmouth. Of the show, he said:

"I can't wait to double bill our work in London, My First Ten Sexual Failures is the proudest writing of my career so far, and I can't wait to put Kristian [Pirotta] through his paces in the award winning GameShow. He's a great sport but I love the challenge of trying to push his buttons every night! The London shows will be riskier than anything else we've tried before, which is some feat considering I shot him in the chest six times with an airgun in the last run of the show."
